How Some Letters Are Lost. [London Standard.]

When letters are lost it by no means follows that the postal authorities are invariably to blame. Sometimes it happens that, through culpable carelessness or sheer shsence of mind on the part of people who mail them, important missives go astray to the great annoyance of everybody concerned. A postman in a northern town has just given the public the banefit of his own recent experience in this direction. In one case a gentleman hastily jerked a letter addressed to a business firm in France into the aperture of a letter box and left it sticking there. Fortunately, the postman was appreaching at the moment to clear the box, or the letter might have been stolen by some unscrupulous passer-by, or lost in the street. On another occasion a gentleman, who was running to overtake a friend, made a dash at the letter-box as he rushed past with two thin postal cards, which caught the edge of the opening and sprang back upon the pavement. The gentleman was quite oblivious of the accident, and, eager to overtake his friend, was quickly out of sight. In the third case a gentleman was walking down the street with a postal card in his hand, and as he drew near the letter box a man at a shop door gave him an advertisement card. Instead of putting the postal card into the letter-box, he carefully posted the advertisement card, and then deliberately folded the postal card two or three times and threw it into the gutier. The vigilant postman was passing slopg at the moment and saw the curious blunder, and the postal card was duly rescued from untimely oblivion.
